LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF THE WAR

Correspondence of the Associated Press

Public opinion heartily endorses the government's decision to place all its resources at the disposal of the allies...

"There is not a moment's hesitation," says the Japan Times, voicing the sentiments of the Japanese press...

Referring to the impracticability of sending troops the newspaper said: "We know full well that our friends, our allies, will not ask or expect this country to take the bread from the mouths of our children..."

Great interest is attached here to references to the European war just made by Baron Takaaki Kato, ex-foreign minister...

ing the first year of the war. After voicing Japan's desire to help the allies with increased ammunition...

Turning to the war itself, Baron Kato expressed the opinion that although Germany has been prepared to a degree of perfection beyond the anticipations of the allies...

The statesman had something to say of France and Great Britain and undoubtedly voiced the prevailing sentiment among Japanese. "France," he declared, "has brought her potential power into play at last..."

ering conviction that the allies would win.

He was impatient, he said, with Japanese alarmists who were obsessed with the idea that Germany will become mistress of the world in the long run...

Baron Kato talked very plainly as to why Japan would not send troops to the European theaters of war. "Such a thing," he said, "is an impossibility, to say nothing of the complete absence of a proper casus belli."

"According to experts a large number of troops would be needed but we have no troops to transport large numbers. The difficulty might be overcome by a special agreement with the allied powers for the supply of their own transports but another and still more serious difficulty is the financing of such a step..."
